

Social Work School Eyes Black Demands

The students and faculty of the School of Social Work at the University of Wisconsin have been asked to meet today to consider support of the demands of the black students at the University.

Some members of the school met in a "day of concern" Wednesday at the Methodist University Center and adopted a resolution which supported the demands.

Included in the resolution was support of the proposals to admit "the three Oshkosh black students found admissible by Vice-Chancellor Young's committee" and to "make visible a black studies department and improve and expand the program of the Afro-American center."
